The Kantian Sublime and the Revelation of Freedom

ROBERT R. CLEWIS

CAMBRIDGE

Contents

Preface and acknowledgments
Abbreviations and notes on Kant's texts	xí
Introduction	I
The Observations and the Remarks	32
1.1 The Observations	33
1.2 Three forms of the sublime, and the grotesque	34
1.3 Virtue	37
1.4 The Remarks : history and background 1.5 Four senses of freedom	42
1.5 Four senses of freedom 1.6 Enthusiasm: the passion of the sublime	45
1.7 Conclusion	50
1./ Conclusion	52
2 The judgment of the sublime	56
2.1 Preliminary issues	58
2.2 The mathematical and the dynamical sublime	64
2.3 A third kind: the moral sublime	84
2.4 Dependent and free sublimity	96
2.5 The monstrous and the colossal	108
2.6 Sublimity elicited by art	116
3 Moral feeling and the sublime	126
3.1 The moral feeling of respect	127
3.2 Sublimity as presupposing freedom	135
3.3 Sublimity as supporting morality	139
4 Various senses of interest and disinterestedness	146
4.1 Interest	146
4.2 First-order and second-order interests	151
4.3 Empirical and morally based interests	154
4.4 Conclusion	167

5	Aesthetic enthusiasm	169
	5.1 Enthusiasm in the corpus	170
	5.2 Affect	176
	5.3 Enthusiasm as morally ambiguous	178
	5.4 Enthusiasm as an aesthetic feeling of sublimity	183
	5.5 "Without enthusiasm nothing great can be accom	oplished" 194
	5.6 Conclusion: Kantian enthusiasm and the revelation
6	Enthusiasm for the idea of a republic
	6.1 The charge against Kant	201
	6.2 Means and ends	204
	6.3 Freedom and the idea of a republic	205
	6.4 The consistency of Kant's position	208
7	Conclusion
	7.1 Summary	215
	7.2 Sublimity's basis in freedom	219
	7.3 The transition to freedom	226
Αn	Appendix 1: On the Remarks	220
_		228
	Appendix 2: Some features of the feelings discussed	in this book 231
	Appendix 3: Classification of what elicits sublimity	232
Bi	Bibliography	235
In	ndex	250	